春流到夏

題目：Subjects at schools are selected by authorities such as the central government (not by the teachers). Some say that these subjects should be chosen by teachers. Do you agree or disagree with this statement?

Education has played an important role in everyone's life. An increasing number of people pay attention to schools' subjects. At present, central governments choose subjects for schools instead of teachers. Although it benefits student's future, choosing subjects by teachers is more suit for students.

Teachers know their students better than others. ^{do} And they can help students to go to the university and also can achieve more opportunities of education. By this I mean, exams will decide whether students can enter the university to get better education, and teachers clearly know about the curriculums and exams. They will choose the most suitable courses for students to study, and then it will improve students' grades. It follows that they can go to the university to get better education.

Teachers need to develop students' interests in study, so teachers choose subjects that their students interested in. Students will have more motivation in studies and make a good progress. For instance, if students are interested in math, they would want to learn more about it and would be a professor or a creator in the future. In addition, when they go to work, they will also bring the motivation, and they will be successful in the workplace.

On the other hand, if governments choose subjects, it is easier for students to get employees in the future. The government knows the society better than teachers. ~~They know the kinds of employees that the society need.~~ 这句话已经是修改完的，但是应该改的还是不对。（原句：They know the lack of what kinds of employees.）And then they will choose subjects to train the professional skills, which means that students will have more competitiveness than others. By contrast, governments pay more attention to practical skills rather than theories. If students can go to work without training, it also can help companies to save costs.
