In many cities, many cities plan to build open areas and many activities can be held there. In my opinion, people can enjoy their life and feel relaxed when more parks ~~may be~~ built.

主语从 cities 改 are

If cities have large open areas, people may have more opportunities to make new friends and develop friendships with their neighbors, which may increase community cohesion. Some music shows, such as live music shows, can be held in these areas, so music lovers can go there and share their ideas with others who have common interests. In addition, art exhibitions can also display some artworks and paintings in outdoor spaces. These activities may enrich cultural lives.

是人展出还是展览在展出??

On the other hand, if there are much outdoor spaces, our living standards may decline. Population has grown and the needs of housing have also increased, but there is not enough land, so people ^{would} have to (不知道怎么改) live in a small room where these people may suffer from illnesses easily. Transport systems may also be influenced, since roads may be narrow. Commuters may spend more time traveling to and from their workplace and these systems (指代上一句的 transport systems) cannot keep pace with the demand (不知道怎么改) ^{for what?} so these people living cities, where there is bad transport, may move to other cities where there are enough apartments and good transport systems rather than many parks.

In my view, it is necessary to build large open areas, because people can have a sense of identity. Many activities can be held in communities, such as flea markets, and sell some homemade products. People who are interested in these products can communicate with these craftsmen ^{新由设计师}, which can build a better relationship between neighbors. Dwellers, especially older people can enjoy their life.

In conclusion, it is important to build open areas to boost a sense of happiness.
