It is important for people in the world to create a new international language to facilitate communication. Some experts agree with this view. But I would argue that a new language might be a threat to cultural diversity and it is also a waste of money to develop and promote it.

If people can use the same language all over the world, it is easy for them to communicate and overcome the language barriers. There are various languages. It is difficult for people to understand each other if they talking by their native language. For example, it is convenient for leaders to solve problems easily together because of a single language. This is also the case for the staff of multinational companies which have offices in different countries, since they can communicate with the same language without facing any problems and make profits together.

Although it possible has a positive effect on communication, I still disagree with the view of creating new language, as it takes much money and time to learn.

For example, English have widely been learned and used by most parts of world. It is difficult for people to learn vocabulary, grammar rules and colloquial language, which has a significant difference between mother tongue language. It could enable people, especially students who cannot afford language courses, or those people who are busy with their work, to have a negative emission on learning new language.
