It is true that people of different ages have different shopping habits. (This is because) what people need and want keep changing with age. For example, young children always spend all their pocket money on snacks and toys, while young adults are fashion chasers saving money for months to buy a Chanel handbag. The money of middle-aged people is mostly spent improving their quality of life through buying larger houses and more expensive cars, whereas people in their sixties or seventies would only pay for their health.

在家工作效率低 - 因为有分心和干扰 - 比如说宠物或者小孩子

Working from home may lead to low work efficiency, because there are so many distractions and interruptions in such an environment. For example, with a pet or a young child in the house, the owner or the parent has to frequently stop working to take care of them or play with them. Thus, people working from home may not be able to finish their job tasks before the deadline or with high quality.

It is common that supermarkets and shops frequently sell food products at a lower price to promote sales, which stimulates consumers to purchase impulsively to get a good deal. This causes people to buy more than what they actually/really need. Those perishable foods, such as vegetables and fruits, are very likely to go bad before they are consumed. This explains why a large amount of food ends up in the landfill.

Many parents believe that it is necessary to give their children pocket money. Without any disposable money of their own, there would be negative impacts on children's money management ability and social development. With regard to the former, it is difficult for children without pocket money to learn to budget money and save to buy better stuffs. Lack of such ability may lead to many problems in their adult life. On a social side, children who are not allowed any pocket money may have to refuse invitations to paid activities, which reduces children's opportunities to hang out with friends.

People who live on higher floors enjoy several benefits. Firstly, they have much better views. For example, the tenants of an apartment on a higher floor are able to see the full picture of the city as well as the natural landscapes out of the city. Secondly, living on a high floor allows the family to live in a better environment, because there is more sunlight into the rooms and better ventilation through the apartment, which is beneficial to keep a healthy living condition.
