- Why is childhood obesity a bigger problem in lower income countries?
- It's true that childhood obesity is a serious issue in today's world and in particular, obesity rates are rising rapidly in lower income countries due to unhealthy foods and inadequate healthcare services. For instance, hot dogs, French fries and other junk foods are usually cheaper and easier to get. Children who always eat these are likely to be overweight or obese. Policymakers must take action to prevent the situation from getting any worse, because obesity can lead to chronic conditions such as heart disease and diabetes.

- Some people argue that the use of robots is a threat to human jobs. Do you agree?

- Well, I totally understand why some people are concerned about a future where robots take away many of our jobs. I've read an article recently about a robot that automates the process of deep-frying foods, like French fries and onion rings. This speeds up the time for people to get their food and reduces the need for human employees. But perhaps new jobs will be created, like those that design and fix this kind of robot. So what I think is that robots, or automation, won't make us all unemployed, but it will be very important for people to acquire new skills in order to stay employed.
